Haacke's imposing bronze sculpture Gift Horse (2014) was created as a commission for London's Fourth Plinth project, which invites artists to fill the vacant space in Trafalgar Square originally designed for an equestrian monument to King William IV (1765-1837). The base intended for the monument was left empty due to a lack of funding; since 1999, it has featured temporary installations by contemporary artists.

Hans Haacke: I believe, throughout history, and not only in the so-called Western world, the production of artifacts and what we call 'art' today has occurred in more or less close connection with the institutions of their time. Many of the objects were, in fact, commissioned by the institutions or enjoyed at least their tacit support.
