efficiency is influenced by the between-firm force of competitive replacement, which itself is determined by the distribution of X-efficiency in the population of firms. We investigate the existence and stability of an equilibrium distribution of X-inefficiency among the firms.

Competition and the evolution of efficiency

Efficiency and Evolution of Social Preferences and Prosocial Behavior. 5.1 Introduction. One might view social life as a sequence of competitive markets where a large number of economic agents interact anonymously and where individual decisions have only a negligible influence on each other. This is certainly an extreme description of the world.
